Dear Mr Hunt,

We write as members of trainee committees who sit on the Academy of Medical Royal Colleges Trainee Doctors Group (ATDG). We represent doctors in training from a broad range of medical specialties and provide a coherent, informed and balanced view on issues such as education, promoting excellence in training and high quality patient care relevant to all doctors in training.

We have significant concerns arising from the proposals for the new employment contract to be imposed on all doctors in training in England and its implications for patient safety and maintenance of a sustainable medical workforce.

The proposals are directly at odds with the stated priorities of the NHS, and the stated aims of the Review Body on Doctors’ and Dentists Remuneration (DDRB). The Scottish and Welsh governments have already declared that they do not intend to impose the proposed contract changes. Imposition of the contract presents an immediate risk to the provision of healthcare throughout the UK, and an ongoing threat to healthcare for generations to come.

Impact on patient safety

Doctors in training already work extensively out of hours, but benefit from some key employment safeguards that penalise trusts from forcing excessive and dangerous hours from their medical workforce. Despite this, specialities with the highest out of hours commitment such as Emergency Medicine, Acute Medicine, Paediatrics and General Practice already show deficits in recruitment. The proposed contracts fail to offer safeguards on hours and working conditions necessary to ensure the safety of all the patients treated within the NHS, and risk a return of exhausted doctors and rise in medical errors inherently linked to clinicians forced to work under such unsafe conditions.

Impact on Training

Excellent training ensures excellent patient care, and is reliant upon a safe and supportive environment in which to train. The proposals would see an increase in the amount of work provided out of hours, and risk a reduction in the amount of supervision and training provided. Training is already significantly eroded by the demands of service provision, but the proposed changes risk further compromise of the quality of doctors patients rely upon to provide healthcare and medical leadership in years to come.

Impact on recruitment and retention

The NHS currently has shortfalls in both recruitment and retention of medical staff in front line services. The proposed new contract regards most evening and weekend work as normal time, which is a further disincentive to recruitment into posts that involve substantial evening and weekend commitment. The Shape of Training review specifically aims to introduce greater flexibility in training, yet the proposed changes risk directly penalising doctors who choose a more flexible career path. This risks compromising the numbers of doctors with formal training and experience in medical education, management or academic research, and disadvantages those training less than full time.

Failure to promote these additional abilities within medicine may lead to a loss of the diversity and skill mix within the profession that is essential for the continued delivery and development of high quality patient care; the foundation for innovation that allows us to remain at the forefront of healthcare in an increasingly competitive international market is at risk.

Whilst we understand the financial pressures on the NHS, we are extremely concerned that the proposed new contract will damage the standard of care available to future patients. We would urge NHS Employers to reconsider any imposition so that all sides together can work out the best approach for a sustainable medical workforce and to ensure we deliver the best care to patients both now and in the future.

Yours sincerely,
